The essay’s score should reflect the essay’s quality as a whole. Remember that students had only 40 minutes to read and write; the essay, therefore, is not a finished product and should not be judged by standards appropriate for an out-of-class assignment. Evaluate the essay as a draft, making certain to reward students for what they do well.

All essays, even those scored 8 or 9, may contain occasional lapses in analysis, prose style, or mechanics. Such features should enter into your holistic evaluation of an essay’s overall quality. In no case should you give a score higher than a 2 to a paper with errors in grammar and mechanics that persistently interfere with your understanding of meaning.

9 – Essays earning a score of 9 meet the criteria for the score of 8 and, in addition, are especially sophisticated in their argument, thorough in their development, or particularly impressive in their control of language.

8 – Effective

Essays earning a score of 8 effectively develop a position on the value or function of polite speech in a culture or community with which the student is familiar. The evidence and explanations used are appropriate and convincing, and the argument* is especially coherent and well developed. The prose demonstrates a consistent ability to control a wide range of the elements of effective writing but is not necessarily flawless.

7 – Essays earning a score of 7 meet the criteria for the score of 6 but provide a more complete explanation, more thorough development, or a more mature prose style.

6 – Adequate

Essays earning a score of 6 adequately develop a position on the value or function of polite speech in a culture or community with which the student is familiar. The evidence and explanations used are appropriate and sufficient, and the argument is coherent and adequately developed. The writing may contain lapses in diction or syntax, but generally the prose is clear.

5 – Essays earning a score of 5 develop a position on the value or function of polite speech in a culture or community with which the student is familiar. The evidence or explanations used may be uneven, inconsistent, or limited. The writing may contain lapses in diction or syntax, but it usually conveys the writer’s ideas.

4 – Inadequate

Essays earning a score of 4 inadequately develop a position on the value or function of polite speech in a culture or community with which the student is familiar. The evidence or explanations used may be inappropriate, insufficient, or unconvincing. The argument may have lapses in coherence or be inadequately developed. The prose generally conveys the writer’s ideas but may be inconsistent in controlling the elements of effective writing.

3 – Essays earning a score of 3 meet the criteria for the score of 4 but demonstrate less success in developing a position on the value or function of polite speech in a culture or community with which the student is familiar. The essays may show less maturity in their control of writing.
2 – Little Success

Essays earning a score of 2 demonstrate little success in developing a position on the value or function of polite speech in a culture or community with which the student is familiar. The student may misunderstand the prompt, or substitute a simpler task by responding to the prompt tangentially with unrelated, inaccurate, or inappropriate explanation. The prose often demonstrates consistent weaknesses in writing, such as grammatical problems, a lack of development or organization, or a lack of coherence and control.

1 – Essays earning a score of 1 meet the criteria for the score of 2 but are undeveloped, especially simplistic in their explanation and argument, weak in their control of language, or especially lacking in coherence and development.

0 – Indicates an off-topic response, one that merely repeats the prompt, an entirely crossed-out response, a drawing, or a response in a language other than English.

— Indicates an entirely blank response.

* For the purposes of scoring, argument means asserting a claim justified by evidence and/or reasoning.

Being polite is considered an unspoken edict in order to be accepted in our first world culture that relies on societal niceties in order to function. Those part of such a community use polite speech to subtly imply intent but as the anthropologist concluded, these phrases are used to communicate politeness rather than the literal meaning of the sentences. This is because although these are unnecessary in accomplishing whatever one sets out to do directly, they are the trappings that make others more receptive to one's own purpose, whether they are superiors, jurors, or even the general public. Polite speech is what enables those who use it to obtain what they want in a society free from the pressures other than simple desire to do something. Polite speech lends respectability to proceedings.

For example, polite speech is an expectation in an environment like school. It is a tacit rule to speak as such when students address teachers or other administrators, and probably that without its implementation, students' words, and by extension, requests or queries, would be disregarded. Polite speech conveys not only a serious intent but also ensures a subservience that students must display to assure their superiors that they are the ones in control. It is used thus when titles like "ma'am" must be used as addresses to imply mastery, and when phrases like "please," "thank you," and "may I" are thrown in to lend an impression of supplication to simple requests. Human nature to assert power over those who ought to follow until they are capable of fulfilling their roles in a community has resulted in polite speech being the indication that respect must be conferred to those higher up in order for one to be taken seriously.
A common platform for polite speech is also when important personages such as politicians conduct ceremonies and must make celebratory addresses. These people know that their words will be broadcast to the general population. Since their continued influence relies on the goodwill of the people, polite speech is used in order to give the impression that their words are official and justified. It separates them from the lower population who use colloquialisms in their informal speech and places these people as higher up on the ladder of authority, to impress upon their subordinates that they ought to be followed. Throughout history language has been associated with those in power and thus those in power continue to use it as the way to signify that they possess the capability to retain that power and are fit for the position to lead. Being polite shows that they don't need to resort to baser tendencies to accomplish goals, and provides a veneer of respectability to their affairs.

Lastly, polite speech makes frequent appearances in the language of those working in service to the law, such as judges, lawyers, clerks, court officers, and other officials present during legal proceedings. As with the example mentioned previously, polite speech adds a sense of elevated respectability to proceedings. In venues where legal cases are being tried, polite speech also is utilized to make it seem as though the decisions made are right and completely justified. Because politeness is associated with propriety and thus ethical correctness, when it is used in official decisions it gives those affected, such as jurors, accused, and witnesses the closure that the ruling was fair and just. It is meant to be confirmation for those listening that it is likely unquestionable that justice was served. This once again is a product of the human need to be supported in their decisions. Human nature can be subject to doubt in all cases, but the polite speech used is able to confer a sense of resolution so that people feel secure about the rulings. After all, if they sound so correct, the rationalization is that it is similarly correct in meaning.

Therefore, it can be seen that although polite speech like regular communication may display intent instead it in fact is used to relate politeness to the receiver. This communicates subservience, respectability, and ethical rightness to the audience for it, and so functions as a method to persuade those receiving the words to the side of the speaker. The usage of polite speech plays on human susceptibility to ethos and pathos in order to influence them to trust and support the speaker, and therefore, it is evident that polite speech is much more than empty words.
In society there are certain standards that are expected to be used. It is expected that when meeting new people or old friends, you communicate with age-old phrases. It is not required necessarily, it is just the norm that is expected. But what function does typical, everyday politeness serve? Why do we never come up with new phrases?

In my experience as an employee at a local yogurt shop, I find myself obligated to inquire how my customers are feeling. It may not be much more than socially expected but a polite 'How are you?' can be more than a polite phrase. I know from experience that when asked 'How are you?' one has a sense of being cared for. The speaker may not mean anything by the phrase aside from standard but knowing that someone cares enough to inquire after their well-being can deep is a pick up. Some times I fail in taking this, but when I do the customers, especially the older generation, seem genuinely surprised. Politeness seems to be a thing of the past, but when one is polite for principle, the need of a room can change with one simple phrase. Another function of polite, even collegial phrases is to show the world that one is not a stuck-up, arrogant person with no concern for the well being of others. As a teenager in today's society it is hard to break the social stereotypes placed on us. Media and social networking have made my generation an egotistical, self-helping, arrogant generation with no respect for their elders, peers or self. Politeness and courtesy are dying concepts, and with the media only encouraging their destruction it is difficult for teenagers to stand out from the stereotypes. Polite speech is also a showing of respect. When asking someone how their day is going when one is saying that whether they want to or not, they care about the other person's well being. Most of the time people respond with the expected, 'I am doing well, how are you?' But sometimes the question may elicit a conversation that was the potential to become the beginnings of a new friendship.
Politeness is expected, and rudeness is socially unacceptable. There are things we are supposed to say, and things they are not supposed to say. And then there are things that people say that go beyond normal expectation. Inquiry after a person’s well-being is a kind gesture, but offering a compliment is far more appreciated.

I once offered a young woman a compliment on her appearance, and she smiled politely and told me I had just made her day. People expect the normal, expected phrases that when one goes beyond the expectation, great things happen.

Polite speech serves a purpose, and we can take that at the bare minimum, but when we go the distance and are kind as well as polite, we present ourselves in a new, friendlier light.

Don’t fit the typical mold. Go beyond expectation and offer a little more of yourself. Sometimes you get a response; other times you don’t. But not expecting...

In your response you will discuss the situation of being a better person.
I see a casual acquaintance down the hall. "Hey, how are you?" I ask. "Bad."
I'm startled. I expected the answer to be, "Good, how are you?" Instead, I'm thrown head first into a conversation of his bad day without being able to change topics from what I'd been focusing on before. My friend was impolite. I really don't mind listening to him talk about his day, but a little warning would've been nice. If I had said "How are you?" and he had said "I'm alright, how about you?" or "Been better, you?" well then, I can say that I'm fine and ask what's wrong and how we've comfortably slipped into a conversation about a bad day. In short, these responses are more polite. In short, polite speech is intended to be just that: polite. Nice, comfortable, and friendly.

In the teenage world, many formalities are ignored. We don't dress fancy, we're not exactly quiet, and we're not too big on shaking hands with each other. But, polite speech is something we hold on to. We say things like “Nice to meet you” when we’re introduced to someone our age by a friend. “We should hang out one day” is also a big one for my age group. Do we mean it? Not always. Why do we say it? Consider the other option.

“Person A, meet Person B”

“Hi. Person B, I didn’t want to meet you.”

Well they were honest. No, not honest; they were rude. Who cares if they didn’t want to meet Person B? Who cares if Person B looks like a jerk and kind of smells bad? Person A ruined that whole exchange, not to mention they embarrassed Person C who introduced them. Long story short, now they’re all pretty uncomfortable. No coming back from that one.

These polite terms are probably evolutions of older greetings and goodbyes. When people said “good day” was it always a good day? Probably not. When saying “charmed” after meeting someone were people always charmed? I’m going to assume not. Our language has evolved to the point where “what’s up” replaces hello and “it was good to see you” replaces goodbye. Rejecting them rejects our current social constructions. Honestly, some of our modern constructions should be rejected; they're outdated and bigoted, but these polite phrases shouldn't. They serve only to foster kindness.

Today, there's suffering, pain, crisis, despair and many other horrible things that people go through every. If we can soften that with "Have a good day." Why wouldn't we?
